ABSTRACT:
I argue that feelings like guilt and admiration cause our moral beliefs, much as sensory experience causes beliefs about physical objects. Moral judgments are accompanied by motivational force because emotions cause both motivation and feeling. I lay out the cognitivist, externalist, and Humean commitments of the model, and defend it using recent empirical research. The model suggests an experientialist account of moral concepts.